

The truth about migrant laborers

Migrant laborers is the reality and backbone of Indian industry sector. When first jute and cloth mill was established in India, migrant laborer factor came to exist. Indian economy is dependent upon migrant laborers and industry sector that has been made strong by this force. Cities and especially metro cities like Mumbai or Kolkata were the big hubs of migrant workers. If anything positive has come out of the Covid-19 crisis, it is that the world's most stringent lockdown revealed the plight of the vulnerable Indian migrant labor force. But, the irony is most powerful factor of industry migrant works is most vulnerable in reality. With no work and no way to feed themselves, removed from family support, millions had no choice but to defy the lockdown and return to their villages. One after another, they marched, carrying their belongings and children, walking thousands of kilometers, determined to find a way home, capturing the imagination of the world. Covid-19 is responsible for mass exodus of migrant workers and exposed their pathetic condition while struggling for a survival. Though business and industry is dependent on migrant labor, it is paid less, works longer and harder, and is more flexible than local labor. Though, in many parts of the world, such a precarious migrant workforce travels across national borders, in India, it is a huge internal migrant force traversing state borders for informal contract work in more developed parts of the country where they are treated as second-class citizens. Usually unable to speak the lingua franca of where they migrate to, rarely represented by any union or social movement, they are easily harassed by employers, government institutions and by other workers. This vulnerability makes them more easily controlled, cheap and dispensable. In India, many of these migrants — about 100 million in total — work seasonally and circulate between their rural homes and faraway work sites for a part of the year. Of course, it has not severed relations with their native villages where they go in vacation for farming. Workers treated the worst often come from regions of India like Jharkhand, Odisha or Chhattisgarh which have long suffered a form of internally oppressive structures as their indigenous wealth — minerals, forests, other natural resources — has been extracted by outsiders, leaving little but high levels of poverty for the locals. The hardest work in the worst living conditions is done by India's historically disadvantaged minorities. Dalits and Adivasis are overly represented as seasonal labor migrants; they make up more than forty percent of the seasonal migrant workforce even though they are only twenty five percent of the population. Whether in the tea plantations of Kerala, chemical industrial factories of Tamil Nadu or road-building in Himachal Pradesh, we found the cheapest and most exploited workers were low caste and tribal seasonal migrants from the central and eastern Indian forested belts, doing work that even local Adivasis and Dalits were moving away from. All these migrant workers are subject to the stigmas of caste and region, treated asjungli (filthy or savage), including by the local workforce.

Fifth, these seasonal migrant workers are, in turn, supported by a further invisible economy — the household. Seasonal migrants can only be workers because of all the work undertaken across generations at home, including care provided by the spouse, children, siblings and elderly parents. But there is also a silver lining to the impact of Covid-19. It brought together thousands to provide relief for stranded migrant workers, find temporary shelters, and provide basic amenities. Journalists, scholars and activists documented their flight.
